Does freedom mean doing exactly as we please? No, that would soon encroach upon the freedom of others. We may, for example, choose our own television or radio entertainment without fearing that a knock on the door will herald armed guards come to drag us off to prison for watching a forbidden program. This freedom of choice, however, does not give us the right to turn the volume of our set so loud that we disturb the neighbors – especially after midnight. We are free to assemble in large groups for football and baseball games, but we aren't free to hit a spectator in front of us over the head with a bottle when we disagree with him.  → Laws (A) our freedom so that the freedom of each citizen is (B). 27. Which of the following can be readily inferred from the passage?

Most male insects are smaller than the females, but there are exceptions. Some of these exceptions make sense as the size and strength of the insect would be an advantage to males which fight for the possession of females. In these cases, as with the stag beetle, males are larger than females. There are, however, other beetles which are not known to fight each other in which males exceed females in size, and the meaning of this fact is unknown.

- ① The stag beetle is mild mannered.
- ② Female insects are usually larger than males.
- ③ Small beetles do not fight for possession of mates.
- ④ There is always a known reason for size among insects.

28. What is the method of developing the passage?

Women on the police force are just as effective as men – maybe more so. If properly trained, women can run as fast and shoot as straight as men. As women are often smaller than men, women can sometimes go through narrow places more easily. They can handle powerfully built criminals by using Taekwondo and Judo. They can be just as tough and fearless as their male counterparts, and they may be more gentle in helping crime victims. Many female crime victims would rather talk to a woman than to a man.

- ① Contrast
- ② Reason
- ③ Effect
- ④ Description

(29-30) Answer the questions following the passage.

Man is but a reed, the most feeble thing in nature; but he is a thinking reed. The entire universe need not arm itself to crush him. A vapor or a drop of water suffices to kill him. But, if the universe were to crush him, man would still be more noble than that which killed him, because he would know that he dies and the advantage the universe has over him. The universe knows nothing of this. All our dignity consists, then, in thought. By it we must elevate ourselves and not by space and time which we cannot fill. Let us endeavor, then, to think well. This is the principle of morality.

29. What is the keyword of the passage?

- ① Man
- ② Nature
- ③ Morality
- ④ Dignity

30. What is the meaning of the underlined word("that")?

- ① The universe
- ② The vapor
- ③ Man
- ④ A drop of water

(31-32) Answer the questions following the passage.

When there is no distance between people, the only way that anyone can keep his distance is by a code of etiquette that has acceptance in a community. Manners are the antidote to adjustment to the group. They make social intercourse possible without any forfeit of one's personal dignity. They are armor against invasion of privacy; they are the advance patrols that report whether one should withdraw or advance into intimacy. They are friendly but noncommittal gestures of civilized people. The manners of crowded countries (for example, in Europe and Japan) are, I believe, always more formal than those of wide-open countries and it may be that we are seeing a rising concern about American manners precisely because we encounter more people in closer quarters than we ever have before. We feel the need to find ways in order to be part of the group without selling out our privacy or our individuality for endless adjustments.

31. According to the author, manners serve to _____.

- ① facilitate relationships among people
- ② preserve certain ceremonies
- ③ help people make friends quickly
- ④ reveal character traits

(33-34) Answer the questions following the passage.

“All roads lead to Rome,” according to an old saying. One of these roads, which goes from Naples to Rome, is the ancient Appian Way, famed in legend and story. The Appian Way is a marvel of road building. It was begun more than 22 centuries ago by a Roman magistrate named Appius Claudius Caecus, for whom it is named. It was designed as a military highway and was laid as straight as possible like a railroad. The paving consisted of large hexagonal blocks of lava fitted tightly together and held with cement. Under these blocks were layers of rubble and thick stones, with a foundation below. The surface of the highway was rounded to let the water drain away. There were cuts through hills, and fillings in hollows; embankments across swamps, and bridges across ravines. So careful was the construction that some of the original blocks remain.

33. The Appian Way was built for _____.

- ① bringing food ② a race course
 ③ pleasure driving ④ army use

34. The surface of the road was _____.

- ① flat ② rough
 ③ rounded ④ winding

(35-36) Answer the questions following the passage.

A play is the result of a collaboration among the author, the actor, the audience, and, I suppose one must add now, the director. For a moment I will consider the audience. All the best dramatists have written with their eyes on (A)it, and though they have more often spoken of it with contempt than with good will, they have known that they were dependent on (B)it. A play does not exist without an audience. Indeed, the definition of a play is a piece of writing in dialogue devised to be spoken by actors and heard by an indefinite number of persons. A play that does not appeal to an audience may have merits, but (C)it is no more a play than a mule is a horse. Everyone who has had something to do with the theatre knows how strangely audiences affect plays. We are told that the Norwegian public looks upon Ibsen’s plays as comedies rich in laughter, while the English public has never seen anything to laugh at in those harassing dramas. The emotion of the audience, its interest, its laughter, are part of the action of the play. The audience is not the least important actor in the play, and if (D)it will not do its allotted share, the play falls to pieces. The dramatist, then, is in the position of a tennis player who is left on the court with nobody to play with.

35. What is the best topic for the passage?

- ① The importance of the actor in a play
 ② The importance of the audience in a play
 ③ The importance of the dramatist in a play
 ④ The importance of the director in a play

36. Which “it” has a different meaning from all the others?

- ① (A) ② (B) ③ (C) ④ (D)

(39-40) Answer the questions following the passage.

The current energy crisis is but the latest in a number of roughly similar problems in the history of our civilization. The first such crisis came far before recorded history, centering on food. The meat eaters became greedy and killed a large part of the once-plentiful supply of game. But instead of withering on the vine, the human race developed agriculture with revolutionary results.

Another problem in the human struggle was recorded more clearly for us in history, as the first energy crisis reared its head. Yet when Rome was faced with a shortage of manpower, the city fathers did not revert to cavemen. Instead, they exploited waterpower. A marvelous system of canals was constructed, and mills and other machines were turned by nature instead of by men. Windmills later added to the power supply and humanity became dependent on this effortless kind of living. Such machines in time led to wood-fired steam engines, and soon there was another energy crisis when the wood was used up. Despite the pessimists, who were vocal in those days too, civilization did not go to hell. Instead, its members got busy digging coal to start another revolution. Later, oil was added, and so was gas.

Today, in spite of coal, oil, gas, and a newcomer called nuclear energy, we are in an energy shortage again. But because we are stubborn types, this crisis also will likely be resolved. There is one critical difference this time, however. In ages past, the shift from one energy source to another was not accomplished quickly.

Instead, it stretched out over a very long of time. Even the most recent change from one energy source to another did not take place in less than sixty years. This time, however, because we have peaked so fast in our use of fossil fuels, we don't have sixty years to switch. We have only a decade or two to get the job done. But it seems likely that human beings, who can put men on the moon and produce computers, can bring off another miracle.

39. What is the mood of the article?

- ① Positive
- ② Negative
- ③ Sarcastic
- ④ Ironic

40. According to the article, which of the following is not true?

- ① Despite nuclear energy, we will face a shortage of energy sooner or later.
- ② In spite of many difficulties, humans have not been ruined.
- ③ The energy crisis will not be solved after all.
- ④ Within a decade or two, we will have to develop a substitute energy source.
